How to tie decorative knots for jewelry

Learning how to make homemade jewelry is easy when you have access to Leather Cord, some pliers, and some ornamental items like pearls and beads. If you want to be truly fashionable this year, all you really need to learn to get started are the various knots used for jewelry making. Jewelry Knots for Leather Cord 1.Overhand knotting The overhand knot is the most familiar type of knot because it's simple: you just put one end over the other, creating a single loop, and that's it. However, this knot is also the weakest and should only be used for separating beads and for non-tension areas of bracelets and necklaces. Pearl knotted jewelry often uses the overhand knot as well as simple patterns that require spacing between the ornamental pieces. Overhand knotting is often used to secure ornamental pieces to prevent damage to the main thread or to ensure that the intended symmetry of the pieces is maintained after the whole piece is tied up at the ends. Round leather cords are most suitable for this type of knotting, as it is easier to fit the round cord through the knot and this allows for the resizing of the jewelry. Use sliding knots if you like to change how your necklace appears, or if you just want to be able to loosen it sometimes when you feel stuffy. Also, changing the length of the necklace can produce a completely different visual effect on the item itself. For example, if you pull an adjustable necklace all the way back, the necklace becomes a nice choker. If you loosen it until you hit the locks on the cord, then it became a matinee-length necklace. Amazing, isn't it? As a quick reminder, be sure to get in all your additional ornamentation and knots before you tie this knot because once it's in, your necklace or bracelet is considered done. A quick tip when using this knot – make sure that you have sufficient excess string on either side, so you can knot properly. Otherwise, you may be able to knot, but the necklace might end up being tighter than usual. An easy way to make sure that you have just the right quantity of cord is by trying on the necklace or bracelet just before closing the final knot. How to make a sliding knot? The lark's head knot can be done by inserting the two ends of the cord to the looped part where the string has been folded in half. The closed tip of the folded string goes around the object (e.g. the pendant) and the loop is completed by the two ends of the string. All you need to do is pull the two ends and the loops are closed. Additional loops may be used on other parts of the string once the pendant has been secured by the main lark's head knot. (Take note that this is great for bracelets and necklaces that require only one main pendant. Otherwise, we suggest using another kind of knot if you are using different pendants of varying sizes throughout the necklace or bracelet.) How to make a lark's head knot? To perform this knot, make one overhand knot but wrap each end around the resulting loop two times on each side. Once the wrapping is done, make another overhand knot and pull until both loops coalesce with each other and you have one neat but somewhat bulky looking overhand knot. This type of knot is recommended mainly for necklaces that require an elastic cord or string, as overhand knots tend to slip with such materials. You can also use this knot if your necklace keeps unraveling because the cord you are using is too slippery. It is absolutely fine to use another kind of knot regardless of what instructions on the pattern are telling you. If the knot that is recommended isn't working, then you need to adapt and modify to ensure that the necklace or bracelet actually works as designed. There's a bit of mechanics involved when making DIY jewelry and you must do what works best. How to make a surgeon's knot? Wrap-around bracelets and necklaces also benefit from square knotting as this type of knowledge is actually decorative and produces symmetrical lines throughout the jewelry that are quite pleasant to look at, especially if you are using two different colors. We highly recommend that you only use cords of the same material and make sure that the tightness of each square knot is proper and consistent throughout the necklace or bracelet. If you want to braid leather cords, this would be the perfect knot to try first. How to make a square knot? The loops are created side by side like petals on a flower, and this knot is considered as a decorative knot. If you have lots of patience, you can use this knot to add texture to your necklaces or bracelets or to create the perfect type of spacer between beads. Definitely an awesome choice for longer necklaces. How to make a josephine knot? It's really simple to make a half- hitch: simply loop one end over the other string and over the bead, create a half loop and insert the end into the main loop and pull. This technique allows the cord or string to wrap around the bead before closing two associated loops with just one pull. You can create a series of half-hitch knots for every large bead you have on your necklace or bracelet. How to make a half-hitch knot? Intricate knots were often believed to bring good fortune or true love to their wearers. These knots and basics will get you started, but how you use them is up to you. Decorative knots make great jewelry, and you can also apply them to sewing projects as applique. Once you've mastered a few techniques, try combining multiple knots, adding beads to your creations, or varying the tying material. Thick rope makes beautiful statement pieces, while thinner waxed linen or nylon cord can create delicate, intricate strands. The combinations are infinite!
